The termination agreement released Friday by the Trump administration includes a provision that denies former White House communications director Hope Hicks access to classified information, terrorism investigations and new security clearances.

Hicks is currently undergoing a security clearance procedure on her own initiative. The agreement does not impact her ability to seek an independent clearance with the government.

Trump administration officials said Hicks had been granted temporary access to classified information to assist in her work. But that access ended Friday after the release of the agreement, which also includes restrictions on Hicks' contact with the media.

The agreement comes amid ongoing investigations into alleged Russian influence in the 2016 election, as well as investigations into the firing of former FBI Director James Comey and the firing of former National Security Adviser Michael Flynn.

The agreement includes a provision that bars Hicks from seeking a permanent security clearance in the future.

The termination agreement also includes restrictions on Hicks' contact with the White House, the office of the president, and the Department of Justice.
